SEATTLE AQUARIUM
2014 ANNUAL REPORT
INSPIRING CONSERVATION OF OUR MARINE ENVIRONMENT STARTS WITH “INSPIRING”

At the Seattle Aquarium, we work to fulfill our mission across a breadth of programs designed to engage and motivate all members of our community. And it all begins with inspiration.
Dear Friend of the Seattle Aquarium,

2014 was an action-packed year at the Aquarium, and we’re excited to share highlights in this annual report, as well as a glimpse into our developing plans for expansion. We’re actively working on our master plan, which will be presented to the Seattle City Council this summer. With seawall construction in full swing and movement on the plan to redevelop the entire central waterfront, now is the time to expand our presence as the centerpiece of Seattle’s waterfront—and enhance our place as the region’s premier platform for marine conservation awareness and education.

From the board of directors, staff and nearly 1,300 volunteers, thank you for your support of the Seattle Aquarium and its mission of Inspiring Conservation of Our Marine Environment. We invite you to visit the Aquarium’s website and blog for details on any of the activities described in this report, and many others.

Sincerely,

Randy J. Tinseth
Chairman, Board of Directors

Robert W. Davidson
President & CEO

Bringing Puget Sound and the ocean back to health won’t happen quickly. It will require time—plus advocacy, research, innovation and action from our generation and generations to follow. That’s why we focus so many of our efforts on youth: the environmental stewards of tomorrow.
To change the way we view marine conservation, our Creativity Inspiring Conservation (CIC) program harnesses the power, creativity and passion of high school students. CIC engages youth through classes and workshops that offer scientific as well as artistic instruction. Participants create works of art that reflect what they’ve learned about marine issues and how it impacts their lives.

SeattleAquarium.org/creativity

Bringing research to life engages kids and their families in science. We partnered with 17 different organizations for our 2014 Discover Science Weekend event and attracted over 5,000 guests. Scientists, researchers and educators hosted booths, shared hands-on activities and presented five-minute “lightning talks” on intriguing topics such as “Narwhal Mysteries 101” and “Swimming with Sixgill Sharks.”

To young people want to change the world—let’s give them the tools and support to do it through the Seattle Youth Ocean Conservation Summit. Over 100 middle and high school students joined us to learn how to put their ocean conservation ideas into action, choosing from over a dozen expert-led workshops, working with mentors to develop action plans, and applying for seed grants funded by the Aquarium’s youth philanthropy and ocean conservation teams.
INSPIRING...

WONDER

Where does wonder begin? In our exhibits every day, with over 10,000 animals, from invertebrates to otters, that fascinate our visitors—and with the stories we share about them to illustrate the vast importance of Puget Sound and the ocean. That’s where wonder begins, followed closely behind by love for those animals, and the desire to protect them and their homes in the wild.
River otters Waadah and Skagway got a new roommate in January, when one-year-old Molalla came to us by way of the Oregon Zoo. He quickly settled in and was soon delighting visitors with his uniquely signature behavior: picking up rocks from the bottom of the pool and balancing them on his nose.

Summer brought us a double dose of fluffy tufted puffin chicks, which hatched in late July and early August, respectively. By mid-September, the chicks were beginning to make appearances in the exhibit and soon joined the other puffins in charming our visitors while diving underwater for food.

Why do Aquariums matter?
Seattle Aquarium President & CEO Robert W. Davidson enthralled an audience of several thousand guests as he spoke on this topic and the power of water as part of the annual TEDxRainier event. Davidson touched on issues affecting our one world ocean as well as those closer to home: ocean acidification, sea star wasting disease, and the protections established for giant Pacific octopuses in Puget Sound in 2013. The talk is available for streaming on the Aquarium's blog: blog.seattleaquarium.org.
An Aquarium that welcomes all members of the community and expands its influence outward into the community at large is a key goal of our strategic plan. We continue to work toward that goal using all means available: developing new ways to reach people, talk to ever-broadening audiences, share our message of marine conservation, and spur positive action on behalf of our marine environment.

It was a DreamNight come true for children and adults with chronic illnesses and/or disabilities. Working with nine partner organizations including Outdoors for All and Seattle Children’s Hospital, the Aquarium held its inaugural DreamNight event in March. Nearly 500 guests joined us for activities, games and a chance to explore our exhibits at their own pace. Post-event feedback was so positive that two DreamNight events were scheduled for 2015.
We hosted more happy campers than ever before with the expansion of our educational marine summer camps, attracting a record-high 311 elementary, middle and high school students in 2014. Campers chose from 19 sessions with themes such as tide pool habitats, aquatic art, intro to marine biology and aquarium exhibit design. We also introduced a new partnership camp with The Center for Wooden Boats, during which campers sailed across Puget Sound, conducted science experiments at sea, and presented their research findings at the Aquarium.

We’re becoming an ever-more accessible and welcoming Aquarium through the Broadening Participation Advisory Committee. Composed of staff from across the Aquarium, the committee was convened in 2014 to provide input, feedback and ideas to broaden participation among Seattle Aquarium audiences. First efforts included a two-for-one coupon to distribute at outreach events in low-income communities; and making a plan to expand our free admission policy to include a broader range of qualifiers.

Meet Marshawn Pinch of the Seattle SeaRocks, a hermit crab who allowed us to engage with the public in a whole new way. Drawing from the Seahawks’ outstanding 2013–2014 season, we created Marshawn Pinch, a determined crustacean inspired by running back Marshawn Lynch. Visitors flocked to the Aquarium to take photos and a live streaming webcam generated over 19,000 views. Pinch was featured on FOX Sports and the Seahawks’ website; social media updates made during games created 5.2 million impressions.
To truly occupy our place as the region’s premier platform for marine conservation education and ecosystem understanding, we must demonstrate our commitment to conservation—both within our facility and in the community at large—while aligning and collaborating with other leaders in the conservation and scientific communities.
Taking a leadership role in the effort to understand “melting” sea stars. In late 2013, sunflower sea stars along the West Coast began dying in large numbers. The Seattle Aquarium quickly joined the multi-institutional collaborative effort to respond to this unusual mortality event, partnering with over 80 institutions across North America. Our staff veterinarian, Dr. Lesanna Lahner, was part of a team that identified what may be a key virus associated with the condition, now called sea star wasting disease. By year’s end, it had impacted 20 species and caused the deaths of millions of sea stars.

SeattleAquarium.org/sea-star-wasting-disease

The new acid test: creating awareness and action around ocean acidification. As a conservation education leader, the Aquarium is sharing information with our visitors about the causes and effects of ocean acidification, as well as the individual and community actions each of us can take to help bring the ocean back into balance. We’re also partnering with scientists at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration’s Pacific Environmental Laboratory to measure ocean acidification in the waters of Puget Sound. By the end of 2014, we’d solidified another significant partnership, with the Wendy Schmidt Ocean Health XPRIZE competition, to develop the world’s most accurate and affordable pH sensors.

SeattleAquarium.org/ocean-acidification-and-carbon-footprint

Each year, we honor marine advocacy excellence in the community with the Seattle Aquarium Medal and Seattle Aquarium Research Award. The 2014 Medal went to Dr. Jane Lubchenco, who served as the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) administrator from 2009 to 2013. The 2014 Research Award recipient was Dr. Joseph Gaydos, a senior wildlife veterinarian at the UC Davis School of Veterinary Medicine’s Wildlife Health Center and chief scientist of the SeaDoc Society.

When it comes to conservation, it’s important to walk our talk—that’s why sustainable practices are a key element of our operations. In 2014, our efforts were acknowledged with two awards for excellence in sustainable operations: the Seattle 2030 District’s “Visionary Leadership Award” and a Community Impact Award in the “Sustainability in Business Operations” category from Seattle Business magazine. SeattleAquarium.org/sustainability2
In 2014, the U.S. Census Bureau determined Seattle to be the fastest-growing big city in the United States. This rapid growth only intensifies the need for the Seattle Aquarium to provide inspiration about the wonders of Puget Sound—and education about what each of us can do to protect it, as well as the ocean beyond.

To meet this need, the Seattle Aquarium must expand our capacity: our educational programming, our outreach, our community engagement and, perhaps most importantly, our facility itself.
Master planning: a vision of our future.

Attract, inspire, entertain and educate even more visitors—up to 1.5 million by the year 2030. Increase the excellence of our animal care and provide ever-better animal habitats. Expand our footprint by as much as 70 percent, providing new exhibit spaces and opportunities to share educational programming with bigger audiences. Those are a few of the key objectives of our master plan, upon which we made significant progress in 2014. Work continued with EHDD, our chosen architectural firm, and Thinc, our exhibit designers, with the goal of presenting the completed master plan to the Seattle City Council in the summer of 2015.

A new seawall is the foundation for what will be a transformed Seattle waterfront, with a transformed Seattle Aquarium as its centerpiece. The City took critical steps toward what is envisioned to be a “waterfront for all” in 2014, completing the first season of seawall construction. Even with the temporary closure of many businesses along the waterfront, we not only survived—we thrived, with an unexpected increase in attendance over 2013.
The Seattle Aquarium is ours, and it’s yours.

This institution is a community enterprise, owned and used by the citizens of our city. We are a community resource, providing programming and outreach for a diverse and ever-expanding array of audiences. We do not—and cannot—exist as an island; the saying “it takes a village” rings especially true here.
What does our village consist of? The expertise and commitment of 100 (and counting) full-time staff. A dedicated team of volunteers: over 1,200 in 2014 alone, providing over 100,000 hours of service. Donors—over 1,000 people, organizations and businesses that pledge their support to us each year.

Important community partners, such as the University of Washington, National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA), Forterra, Vulcan, Seattle Foundation, Gates Foundation, Puget Sound Partnership and others.

And, perhaps most critically, you.

To our board, donors, members and volunteers. Without you, there is no Seattle Aquarium. With you is the extraordinary 21st-century facility we are working to become.
Simply put, the Seattle Aquarium of today wouldn’t be possible without the volunteers who give so generously of their time. This talented, dedicated group provides support to every area of our operations. In 2014 alone, 1,282 volunteers donated 100,846 hours of service to the Aquarium, at a value of $2.2 million—that’s the equivalent of an additional 48 full-time staff to our existing 100 full-time employees. The total hours of service also include 32,493 hours provided by 280 youth volunteers. Visit our website at SeattleAquarium.org/volunteer to view a list of 2014 volunteers.

Kevin and Jane Wu
Kevin Wu knew he wanted to become a volunteer when he “fell in love” with the Aquarium two years ago. He and his mom, Jane, went through the training together and can be found volunteering as a pair as well as separately. “I love working with my mom,” says Kevin. “It’s great that we both love learning about animals.”
Andres Diaz

"The Aquarium is like the trailer of a movie called Our Amazing Marine Environment. An environment we’re all part of and that we can see right outside,” says volunteer Andres Diaz. “That’s why I love the harbor seal exhibit—it’s a window to the Sound.” Andres became a member on his very first visit to the Aquarium and started volunteering soon after. “It feels great to have the opportunity to inspire others to conserve our environment,” he says.

Bethany Shimasaki

“The Aquarium helped me figure out that I’m an ocean person,” says Bethany Shimasaki, a five-session veteran of our Youth Ocean Advocates program. She says volunteering not only illuminated her future career path—marine biology—but also taught her a vital lesson: “How to come out of my shell and truly be myself.”

The Seattle Aquarium truly became a unified organization on December 31, 2014, with all staff employed by the nonprofit. The transition began in 2010, when the Seattle Aquarium Society assumed management of the Aquarium, which had previously been operated and managed by the Seattle Parks Department. City employees were given the opportunity to join the nonprofit at any point during the five-year transition period, which also saw an increase of full-time staff from 75 to 100 employees.

Note: staff who worked more than 200 hours at/for the Seattle Aquarium in 2014 are included on this list.

SEACHANGE

The Aquarium’s second annual SeaChange fundraising event attracted over 400 guests, who generously donated over $115,000 in support of our mission. The event was co-chaired by Linda Springmann and Dianne Bell and held at Seattle Sheraton Hotel. Keynote speaker Ted Danson, actor and marine advocate, motivated and inspired the audience with his words about the ocean and the actions needed to bring it back to health.
